

Kentucky Calls in to See, Hear Provost Students

A high school classroom full of students from Corbin, Kentucky was seen and heard inside Provost Public School on Friday, March 3 through a video-conferencing session.

The U.S.A. students also got to peek inside the classroom at PPS and hear what was happening during the international hour long learning session that was mainly held to get acquainted and test the system over a long distance.

PPS and other schools across Buffalo Trail Public Schools are already using the system in Alberta to deliver classes to some students (see PN Sept. 21, 2005 or go to: http://www.provost-news.ca/thenews/arch/2005/september_21.html).

There were about 10 students at PPS who first made a general presentation to the Kentucky students with distance education teacher Jennifer Romanchuk of Dewberry also in the room. Romanchuk is one of the distance teachers in the school division as is Brad Pylypow of Provost who teachers physics over the distance edu-

PPS students showed a video of school life and told generally about the Town of Provost and included some supporting slides about the economy.

After that presentation 31 students from Kentucky along with their teacher Pam Bishop made a presentation to PPS which also included a video of their school. The students showed other video clips and talked about books that they found popular and recommended PPS students read them.

There was then a general question and answer time held.

The Kentucky school “visitors” asked what it would take in the winter to shut schools down here. The answer: minus 52 degrees Celsius (includes wind chill) and they in turn were
