

What to Wear to the Première?

by Marion Kelch

A première is a special occasion celebrating the first screening of a film. It brings to mind movie stars and celebrities, arriving in their limousines and stepping out in their finest gowns and jewels. Often the styles of costumes pertain to the theme of the movie being premiered. For example, those attending the première of the film "Dr. Zhivago" would wear costumes in Russian style.

their knees to draw attention to them.

Technically, the Flapper fashion was from 1925 until 1928 but the image of these vibrant women in bobbed hair and short skirts lives on in the conscience of the Roaring Twenties.

The popularity of the Charleston required shoes to be securely fashioned and to have a low heel.

Accessories included long thin scarves or sashes tied around the hips and worn to the side. A long single strand of faux-pears was common.

Men's fashions at the early part of the 1920s included the "Sacque" suit, worn with colored shirts, ties with small patterns, and black bowler hats. Two-tone shoes were very popular. Men's pants are a most interesting aspect of fashion during this era. Knickers, also known as knickerbockers, were seen in casual wear.

Mid-decade saw the rise of the baggy pant some as wide as 40 inches around.

Jazz fashion also had a period of popularity and men's jazz suits were close fitting and tight waisted with tight skinny pants.

Fashions of the 1930s

The stock market crash of 1929 and the following years of the Great Depression and Dust Bowl certainly impacted the fashion world. For the majority of North Americans the focus turned away from new clothing to that of reusing and remaking the clothes one already owned. On the drought stricken Prairies, many dresses were creatively sewn from flour sacks. Some people did not even have shoes to wear.

For those lucky few who still had money, the shape of the fashions for both men and women was long and sleek. Muted and deep hues were popular as were abstract and geometric prints.

For women, hemlines dropped to the ankle and waists returned to the natural waistline from the dropped waist popular in the Twenties. Necklines dropped and were accentuated with scallops or ruffles.

Men's suits were often double-breasted and trousers were long and full. Dark fabrics were most common but there were accents of herringbone or vertical stripes.

So what to wear to the Provost première?

If you happen to own or to find a vintage 20s or 30s outfit to wear that would be great.

If not, don't fuss.

Simply dress up like you would for a special occasion such as a graduation, church service, or to attend a wedding.

Most important: Be there to enjoy the film, the food, and above all, to meet former area resident Pete Friesen.

the first time Provost has ever held a film première and certainly a Canadian première. It is suggested that the fashions could represent the era when Pete Friesen resided in the Rosenheim district, which was from 1925-1934.

Fashions of the 1920s

In the 1920s the newly developed movie industry influenced the fashions of women with its glitz and glamour and many women wanted to dress like movie stars.

The feeling of liberation that characterized the 1920s, women having won the right to vote in some parts of the world, affected fashions.

During the early '20s women's waistlines began to drop, first to just below the natural waistline and then eventually to the hips. The "shift" dress was popular and most dresses had completely straight bodices. At first the hems were long, and then gradually rose to the knee by the end of the decade. Many young 'flappers' were anxious to show off their knees, which was forbidden until this time. Some rolled down their stockings and put rouge on
